I've had maybe a daily encounter with Stewart on email or Twitter. “Oh wow” — he said it three times, according to his sister. Was it his thinking or the way he was thinking that was special? The drugs didn't work. Or at least only for a bit. “I'm not sure it was ever the drugs,” says Turner. “I think it was the idea.”

Among the bibles of my generation’s computer revolution was a 1970 Whole Earth Catalog. Its vision was simple: “We have seen the future and it works.” The Catalog represented. A thin, blond guy hung out with the Pranksters for about 10 minutes. "It was "strenuous and inspiring and heroic and tragic", he said. "And it was a period of such intense creativity." He's trying to resurrect extinct species, to bring them back to North America. "I cannot think of a more thrilling challenge."

I think the Catalog represented this idea: the idea that the tools of empowerment have absolutely lowered the barrier to entry. The tools of empowerment have absolutely lowered the barrier to entry. The tools of empowerment have absolutely lowered the barrier to entry.

And as radical as they come: de-extinction. He's trying to resurrect extinct species, to bring them back to North America. "I cannot think of a more thrilling challenge."

But as Turner says “it's full of stuff to buy. All those down jackets and baby carriages and computers and the like.”

The hip chicks will do it. It is easier to find a chick who will have sex now than it was two years ago when things were extremely difficult. "And even if you have a kid or two, you can pretty much keep up," Turner says. "Women have a lot to do."

The Whole Earth Catalog is a catalogue first published in Fall 68, Brand and his team published it officially until July 71, the date on which they release the Last Whole Earth Catalogue. This publication got the National Book Award in 1971 and it was published at more than one million copies. This book was a manual for the back-to-land people, a book of lists of tools that they need to live in communes. People went back to the land and try to reinvent civilisation. Brandâ€™s Whole Earth Catalog and Coevolution Quarterly were innovative crystallizations and guides to the â€˜back to the landâ€™ movements of the late â€™60s and early â€™70s. . . . Reinvention: are we up for that?
