We can thank a couple of gentlemen for this, but this is not the main purpose of my retort to Tim Brighouse's article on teacher (CPD) continued professional development in The Guardian on Tuesday. What I would like to do, is impart an objective and balanced leadership perspective on staff professional development, from trainee teacher to headteacher, in order to present to you what I really think of staff development for our profession. Over the past 20 years, I have developed, evolved and grown; I have increased, sh History teaching was good or better in most primary schools, and most pupils reached the end of Key Stage 2 with detailed knowledge derived from well-taught studies of individual topics. However, some pupils found it difficult to place the historical episodes they had studied within any coherent, long-term narrative. They knew about particular events, characters and periods but did not have an overview. There is a pressing need for primary teachers to be better supported in their professional development in history, and for the curriculum to ensure that pupils study overview as well as in-depth topics so that they can develop a coherent chronological framework for the separate periods and events that they study. In terms of secondary schools, it noted
History with Pleasure for the Development of Imagination and Good Understanding. The use of historical examples is ancient and no doubt predates written language. We can imagine cave dwellers sitting around the evening campfire sharing stories of admired ancestors worthy of emulation. Teaching history can be more practical and interesting when it is coordinated with other subjects. We can now narrow our focus to the special role played by history within the educational scheme.
